The Lace-Maker.

BY LINHOLM.

THERESA made beautiful lace. why?" That herself and her father and mother might have black bread and käse. She was very industrious, although she could make only a small piece of lace in a whole long day. But her patterns were so lovely that visitors at the Spa came to Dasdorf to see and admire her beautiful and intricate work. Was it all the doing of her fingers? No, no! the wise young head guided the deft fingers, for she designed her own patterns.

"Theresa, why came you not to the chorus last night?" asked Herman, watching the busy hands that scarcely stopped for greeting. "And why not lay aside your work for the day? come, let us walk among the linden. It will refresh you,

"Nein, Herman, I must occupy each moment. Have you not heard the words brought to Dasdorf to-day for the lace-ma-

"What words?"

"That a great lady of foreign parts who visited the Spa last summer, has offered one hundred thalers to the lace-maker who shall design the most beautiful pattern. The lady is just betrothed to a great lord, and when the roses come again is to be the wedding-day. It is scarcely a twelvemonth, and whoever wins the prize will be the directress of all the lace-makers, for the dress will be so rich and delicate that one worker alone could hardly make it in her lifetime.

"And do you mean to contend for the

"Yes, Herman, and I must be very busy, for while I am thinking what my design shall be, I must labor on my usual work, that if the lace-makers of Dasdorf do not succeed and so this great piece of good fortune goes to some other village, I may not make bad friends with my present employ-

"But, Theresa, you work too hard. The fräuleins were at last evening's cho-

"Yes, Herman, but the other fräuleins have not a father so paralyzed as mine."

"True, Theresa. Oh that we lived in America, where each man has room and work and wages!" said Herman, with a shadow on his brow. "Theresa, I can't bear it much longer, this looking on and seeing you wear yourself to a shadow. If I can't make enough for both of us here, I must go to America, and after a while send for you and your parents."

"Be not so anxious, dear Herman. If I win this prize my fortune is made and then we can stay in our birth-land and be happy under our own lindens. Think, Herman, I shall be so famous that I shall have all the work I can do as long as I live and have a better price, and perhaps be a contractor myself!"

Herman smiled, but it was a cloudy smile. "Any way," said he, "you must have all the help Minna and Fritz can give you. They love you so well, they will hasten their own work to get time for assisting you. They can do many offices about the house, and Minna is dexterous with her needle, besides, as you know, for you taught her. Remember, Theresa, that your pale cheeks reproach me for what I can not help-but will yet-in America."

Minna and Fritz were Herman's sister and brother. Minna kept the house and was mother to her big brother Herman and to her small brother Fritz. She baked the black bread and boiled the beans, swept and scrubbed the floor and made many of their clothes. Besides this, the little maid found time to braid straw, singing with Fritz while he was making brooms to sell. The two children loved Theresa dearly. She was always kind and loving toward them, and ready to advise little mother Minna-for notwithstanding the little woman was so accomplished a housekeeper, who sometimes, even at this advanced stage, met with perplexities which Theresa could unfold and smooth. Often Minna would carry her braiding and Fritz his straw or curled shavings to "Sister Theresa's," and ply their little trades while the lace-maker told them stories, sometimes from Hans Christian Andersen, and sometimes from her own fancy.

The day succeeding Herman's talk with Theresa, Minna came to help about the house that Theresa might have no cares to distract her from her double task.

"There, Theresa, the bread is in the oven and the hearth swept and Fritz is coming to the doorstep.

"Thanks, dear Minna; and will you Fritz go to the cottage of Lame Pierre and beg for me a cluster of his beautiful lilies and some roses Stickerin's two little twins, and how I would like for one half hour to see their faces and hands unstained with sweetmeats; and to look at clean pinafores would please me better than to think of white wings. Besides, I do not believe that angels have any wings."

"O Minna," said Fritz aghast, "not believe in wings!

"Nein. I like them for birds, but I think angels can float along without any wings, for God has none.

"How do you know?"

"Did they not tell us at the school that we were made in His image? and we have no wings. I am glad, for feathers would be so warm.'

"Do you think so? Well, I would not care. I would so like sometimes to fly away. And I remember I learned a verse about His sheltering us under his wings.'

"Where would you fly?" asked Minna, without pursuing the argument.

"Oh, if I had beautiful white wings—I think they are beautiful-I would go to the great blue sea and fly over the ships, and I would go to other towns and find out wonderful things, and come and tell our people about and buds and a spray of his fuchsia? I know he will spare them to me."

Theresa was correct. Lame Pierre had received many kind attentions from the franlein and had too much grace to refuse any request of hers. Fritz returned with the flowers and while Theresa wrought on her usual work she pondered the most charming method of combining the exquisite blossoms with the other details of her design for the prize.

Absorbed in her work, Theresa told no stories, so Minna and Fritz quietly carried the straw they had brought to fill up their spare moments, out of doors to a green and shady spot. No longer restrained by the meditations of "sister Theresa" they gave as full play to their tongues as to their fingers.

"Minna," said Fritz, "I wish you would pretend you are Hans Christian Andersen or Theresa and tell me a story, a real make-believe story."

"I can not," replied Minna, "I do not have story thoughts come in my head."

"Oh, yes; I am sure you must have," said Fritz, "many thoughts of child-angels with

"No, no, Fritz, I think more times of Frau

But I would not be a child-angel, would I?"

"I hope not, dear Fritz," said Minna, two big tears in her affectionate eyes.

"No," went on Fritz thoughtfully; "but a child-angel could do many things that a real child, even with wings, could never do." "What else?"

"Oh, a child-angel could talk with birds, and trees, and stars, and flowers. Before I went quite to sleep last night I thought of a child-angel who flew over a beautiful tall lily. 'Beautiful flower,' said the angel, 'what makes you so white and so sweet?' 'Because I am pure in my heart,' said the lily. Then the angel went to the flax and whispered, 'Blue flax, blue flax, can you tell me a secret?' The flax said, 'Some day I will be a linen pinafore for your little earth-sister.' He flew next to the rose and said, 'Rose, rose, what makes all fragrant around you?' And rose said, 'Because I love everybody and everybody loves me.'" "What then?" asked Minna, as Fritz paus-

"Oh, he flew over the hills and over the tree-tops up into the air towards a lovely pink cloud, and the cloud opened and took him in.

Have you not often seen angels in clouds at sunset?"

"I do not think I ever did; but 'schivester Theresa' will think our wings have grown and we have flown away if we do not go in and set the table," and practical Minna quickly followed her words.

Time passed, and at last came the day on which was announced the decision. Lace-makers of three towns contended, and the number of competitors was nearly thirty. Of all the designs Theresa's was pronounced the most elegant, and the hundred thalers were awarded to her. She was sent for to confer with the Lady Genevieve in person, who tarried at the Spa until she should see the designs. The dress was to be very full and elaborate, so that many lace-workers were necessary, and Theresa was made the directress.

Busy months rolled on. The time of roses came again, and the exquisite robe was almost finished. The dwellers in Dasdorf determined that the day which saw its completion should witness a celebration in honor of Theresa, who had brought abundant work and celebrity to Dasdorf. Accordingly a festival was arranged in Der Garten. A procession of lacemakers was formed. Two children, Minna and Fritz, in appreciation of the many times they had rendered the directress faithful services, were placed at the head, and very proud and happy were they, bearing bouquets and an inscription of congratulations. Next came the worthy burgomaster who insisted on joining the procession. Then a double file of lace-makers, dressed in white and adorned with roses, lilies, and fuchsias.

Theresa awaited them in Der Garten, whither her feeble mother and paralytic father had been brought to enjoy the day. All was very sunny and happy. The band played, coffee and seed-cakes were dispensed, and then the burgomaster advanced toward Theresa, and said,

"The noble duke, who is next week to be married to the Lady Genevieve, has sent me a purse of money, equal to five hundred thalers, as a wedding portion for the directress. We will all be glad for her whom we love, because she is so industrious, so dutiful, so kind."

Acclamations were heard on all sides, and the band struck up a joyful air, under cover of which Theresa said softly to Herman,

"Did I not say that if I won the prize my fortune would be made, and we could remain in our fatherland?"

Saying "Please." BY W. P. JACOBS.

Wно could help loving, fair-haired, bright-eyed little Bonnell? He is one of those mischievous eight-year-olds, that one must pet in spite of one's self. And yet he is n't all mischief either. Now and then, he makes one's eyes open with astonishment, and one's hands go up with the exclamation, "What a child!"

Bonnell's pa is rather careless in religious matters and sits down often at the table, without thinking of the "blessing." "Pa!" said the little fellow, the other day, "ma says God made you. Did he, pa?"

"Yes. He made me."

15

"Well, pa, are you glad He made you?"

"Why, Bonnie, of course I am, what questions you do ask."

The child's mind was evidently working out a problem, but he didn't exactly know what it was.

After a pause—"Pa, what does Uncle Sam ask a blessing at the table for?" "I reckon because he wants to."

"He says he wants to thank God for his dinner, but I told him that you worked for your dinner, and made it. God doesn't give it to you, does he, pa?"

"Well—yes—I suppose He gives me mine,

Bonnell looked up with astonishment, and then fell to vigorously with his knife and fork. Suddenly he asked again, "Pa, does God want Uncle Sam to thank him?"

"Yes-child-I suppose so."

More silence.

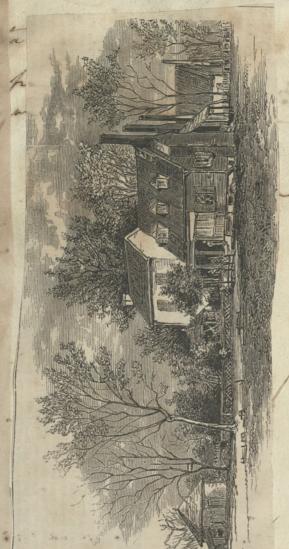

"Pa, I'm mighty glad God is n't like you, for if he was, we would never get anything more to eat, and then we'd starve."

"Why, Bonnell, what do you mean?"

"I was just thinking. You would not give sister that apple, 'cos she would not say, 'Please,' and if God is that sort of way, he never would give us anything more, because we do n't thank him, like Uncle Sam?"

"Be quiet, Bonnell, you don't know what you are talking about."

The rest of that meal was eaten in silence, but that very night at tea, Bonnell's father astonished his family, by saying "Please" to God.

When Chanticleer in early morn
Winds his keen and merry horn,
Meadow mists, all pale and shy,
After moonshine, fading, fly;
Dew-wet daffodils arise,
Pansies open their dark eyes;
Apple blossoms, far and near,
Unlock their dainty buds to hear;
Sunbeams waken at the note,
Down the blue they flit and float;
Dream and midnight fantasy
To haunt of elf and goblin hie,
Or make a forty-minute dart
To vex some timid Chinese heart;
Laughter, Love, and Fancy stray
Through the young sweet world of May.
